Doctoral Dissertation

“Cyprus and the European Union: strategies towards full integration”

The objective was to examine the European integration of Cyprus from a socio-legal perspective through an analysis of elements of its Europeanisation and of its governance embodied in the EU acquis, by identifying any specificity of Cyprus’s process of integration into the EU within the context of EU Enlargement (comparative analysis of the 2003 Treaty of Accession, of Protocols 3 and 10 on Cyprus) and by looking at the implementation of the rules of the Internal Market in Cyprus.

Cyprus finds itself at the crossroads between enlargement and integration due to its de facto division. The rules of the Internal Market, which constitute the core of EU law, are not applicable on the whole territory of Cyprus, giving rise to a special regulatory regime within the EU legal order which needs to be delimited and analysed. One of the key arguments of my PhD thesis is that the Internal Market is an instrument of deep economic integration which can lead to political integration through market integration. For this purpose, I take the EU external trade dimension (CCP and related policies) as an integral part of the Internal Market and, drawing a comparison with the deregulatory and re-regulatory mechanisms of the Internal Market central to European integration, I argue that the (non)implementation of the Internal Market in Cyprus is central to its (non)integration into the EU. As a result, I analyse the extent to which the rules of the Internal Market are implemented de facto in Cyprus and if so, how this regime can lead to ‘full’ integration.

Book review(s):

N. Skoutaris (2012) 37(1) European Law Review 106-108

“The timely and valuable contribution of Lauthé Shaelou is the first comprehensive study of this special case of “variable geometry” within the Union membership of Cyprus. Following a socio-legal approach, (the author) argues that “the integration of Cyprus into the EU provides a particular mode of Europeanisation and of governance of a small State in its quest towards full integration into the EU” [...] The reader of this book will not only have the chance to follow an argument that is clearly written, structured in a logical way and properly referenced but also familiarise herself/himself with the range of principles and strategies that the Union has used in order to integrate a divided island within its political and legal order.”

A. Emilianides (2012) 1 The Cyprus Yearbook of International Law 178-80

“The book is an extremely important tool and guide, for anyone specialising or interested in the process of European Integration of Cyprus. ... the book ... is an invaluable companion which focuses on independent legal (but never legalistic) analysis rather than on camouflaged ideology.”

P. Athanassiou (2012) 24(2) The Cyprus Review 139-42

“Lauthé Shaelou’s work does not make for light or uncomplicated reading material: the reader should not expect a run-of-the-mill, conventional work of legal scholarship, of which there are many in the public domain, some better than others. Far from being intended as a point of criticism, this last observation explains why her work is of such interest, prompting the reader to reflect on integration possibilities that no level of familiarisation with the Treaties would, prima facie, suggest exist. ... All in all, The EU and Cyprus: principles and strategies of full integration is a refreshing and original work of legal scholarship, carved out of rather unassuming beginnings: the accession of yet another candidate country to the EU.”
